

THE SPIRE

August 2022

It happens often in our house. The kids will pick up on a particular phrase or familiar statement and define it within their own context. "Maybe" in their minds becomes no, just with a delay. "Let's see where your behavior has been," will usually be interpreted as don't ask again or else you might lose the opportunity. There is one phrase which will often incur a groan more than any other. Like when my Dad would use the phrase, "It builds character," which was always code for a ton of work for the good of learning to work. That phrase we use is "teachable moment."

Now there have been "teachable moments," which don't illicit a response like when every Saturday during the early weeks of the pandemic we would all load into my SUV and volunteer for Project Resilience. We would pack the meals in the back of the car, get our masks handy, and drive along with Longtos and Helsleys around Hurley delivering meals. We felt it was important for the kids to know why we did what we were doing, and why we gave of our time, gas and selves to help those in our community. Sure there were some days when we spent more hours than we needed to trying to figure out where a house was. And there were moments when the kids were bored. But on the last day they were both sad that this time of serving others had ended.

But there are other moments when an attempt to teach falls flat. At the Walk for Water I was convinced that I needed to have the kids understand what we were doing and the impact that clean water would have on them or on someone in a similar circumstance to us. I filled up my two five gallon buckets and headed down the rail trail. Barbara got rid of her water pretty quickly and was off running with Teagan. Liam instead of listening to the lesson was more focused on taking care of or worrying about me. And as I plodded along, knee aching and hands straining to hold the buckets, Liam couldn't hear the lesson. I won't call it a failed lesson, because I still hope that the kids might look back someday and learn from it, but it didn't succeed like I had hoped.

The lesson was entirely mine. Instead of the kids seeing how heavy the burden children in like circumstance to us with one parent physically disabled, was, I learned that I am not as young as I was. My hands still hurt a bit from that day. My shoulders ached for days and my arms felt like they had been stretched a few inches. My lesson was one in my own humanity. And humility when I had to share this with my siblings.

The success or lack thereof of a moment doesn't necessarily determine the overall success. What is a teachable moment now might be a lesson lost later, and what is a lesson which falls flat might be a lesson which someday awakens a dormant faith to new heights and depths. What matters in these lessons is our ability to listen and learn in them. It is about us allowing God to move and speak in ways that are familiar but also ways that are profoundly and dramatically different.

What matters is are we listening and can we take the lesson to heart when it is given. While school is done for most of us, the lessons of faith make us lifelong learners.
